We are joining each other today from across Washington State, which was historically home to many tribal communities. Today we would like to honor the land where the Administrative Office of the Courts makes its home in Olympia, WA. The Nisqually tribe lived on the lands from Olympia to portions of Mt Rainer and often gathered for Potlaches with other coastal tribes in the areas to the East and West of Budd Inlet, a favorite area for shellfish gathering and now the city of Olympia's coastal water access point. We honor the gifts the Land brought to the Nisqually and also honor the Nisqually tribe and the trials that they have gone through since the forced colonization of these ancestral lands. We also give thanks for the tribal members here with us today, and greatly respect the work you are doing to reunite families and to care for your children. We see you, respect your right to sovereignty and self-determination, and are committed to being better listeners, learners, and in lifting indigenous voices. Feel free or use the maps we have placed in the chat to learn more about the tribe in your local area, and share in the chat.

Kelly Warner King

Kelly Warner-King, JD, is the Manager of the Family & Youth Justice Programs at the Administrative Office of the Courts. An attorney with extensive legal and policy experience in child welfare and education, Kelly leads programs that improve court systems to promote thriving families and equitable court communities.

Previously, she served as Director of the Court Improvement Training Academy (CITA), where she developed and delivered training for judicial officers and court partners and facilitated interdisciplinary court improvement efforts. Kelly serves on a variety of state-level workgroups to improve the administration of justice in child welfare. Kelly's experience includes work in the dependency court system as an attorney for parents and children, the manager of the King County Family Treatment Court and the coordinator of the Supporting Early Connections program for the Center for Children & Youth Justice. She was also the first Legal Ombuds in the Washington State Office of the Education Ombuds and worked as an education policy analyst with the RAND Corporation. Kelly received her law degree from New York University, where she focused on juvenile rights and representation, and her undergraduate degree from the University of Virginia
